£500m literacy drive has 'almost no impact' on children's reading skills

Last updated at 09:38 02 November 2007

Ministers have spent half a billion pounds on raising standards of English in primary schools with "almost no impact" on children's reading skills, a major review warned today.

Pupils feel increasingly stressed about school tests and are losing their love of books in the drive to improve literacy levels, the Primary Review found.

More than £500million poured into English teaching and testing has had "almost no impact" on reading standards and took the enjoyment out of the subject for many children, a study found.

Pupils also felt increasingly stressed by constant tests.

The findings emerged from the Primary Review, the biggest inquiry into primary education for 40 years.

The review is based on three reports from experts at the universities of Bristol and Durham and the National Foundation for Educational Research.

The Durham study, led by Professor Peter Tymms, found Government initiatives to improve primary standards had proved poor value for money.

Labour spent £597million between 1998 and 2005 on initiatives to improve English lessons, including a daily literacy hour but this had made a "barely noticeable" impression on reading standards.

In fact, standards had barely improved since the 1950s, the research found.

Dramatic improvements in primary school test results in the last decade had vastly overstated the true scale of pupil gains, it went on.

This was largely because staff were merely coaching children to pass the tests without actually deepening their understanding of subjects.

The report also warned that pupils' enjoyment of reading was declining.

It cited a drop of 12 percentage points in the number of 11-year-olds who say they like reading stories.

The National Foundation for Educational Research suggested improvements in reading standards had come "at the expense of pupils' enjoyment of reading".

The third report, from Bristol-based Professor Wynne Harlen, said pupils should no longer sit 'key stage' tests.

Instead, teachers should be responsible for assessing youngsters.

He said the tests were "a poor measure for any individual pupil" and that as many as one in three may be given the wrong grade.

Nick Gibb, the Conservative schools spokesman, said: "Millions of pounds have been spent on education but we haven't seen the improvements to match."

But Schools Minister Lord Adonis said: "Primary standards are at their highest ever levels. This is not an opinion - it is fact."
